

If You're So Sure ...

A Message to Wind Energy Developers

If you're so sure wind turbines don't cause health problems, why not ask the government for a full environmental assessment, including an examination of health risks, to prove your claim? Please, just one independent study could be enough to convince us. Otherwise, your assertion is simply without merit.

If you're so sure properties near your turbines won't lose their value, why not indemnify the owners against whatever losses they might suffer?

(While you're doing this, can you tell us why you can't sell the properties you've already purchased from the people who couldn't do likewise?)

If you're so sure local tax revenues will not decline as a result of diminished property values, why not offer to make up any difference in lost tax revenue to our Municipality?

That is, if you're so sure. If you can "put your money where your mouth is," we may start considering your nonsensical claims.

To our fellow citizens: Who can you trust? Those who will profit financially from wind turbines at your expense? Or your neighbours who are simply suggesting you examine the evidence for yourself?

Don't take our word for it. Educate yourself on the real facts. Start asking some hard questions about the impact of wind turbines on your family, your business and your community.
